Visual Inspection . (US) See also . But the answer is that you don't have to feel that way about it. I've seen people be perfectly satisfied with what's in front of them, the only thing being its function, and the result of its function, and that's not enough for them. They want to think about that, they want to see things in a greater perspective. But they do not have the time. They have not the time to have some kind of abstract reasoning about everything. They want to feel that it's all right. So it's not an intellectual problem, but an emotional problem. I've seen people of every culture react in the same way. Kesler had returned to California and gone to work for Boeing. His job took him around the country for many months every year, most recently to Tokyo, where he was part of the "Liaison Group" established by the USA to inspect and certify aircraft to meet American and Japanese regulations. Is The Effective Church Losing Its Contentment? (Aug. 10, 2015). Church leaders may be suffering from a lack of contentment. It's an interesting question to consider. I mean, it's not a new question. In the Beatitudes, Jesus promised his followers an abundance of joy, and he had some good advice for how to live well and receive that joy. So we're always looking for that kind of contentment. But sometimes it's missing, and it can cause problems. I don't want to give you some completely unrealistic goal. I just want you to keep in mind that this is the object of the study of history. It's important to study history because it teaches us to understand the present. It teaches us what we can expect in the future. It shows us how we can improve our society, how we can improve our lives. But the answer is that you don't have to feel that way about it.
